Mr. Johnny Lyu
Chief Executive Officer
KuCoin
TRANSMITTED VIA EMAIL

Dear Mr. Lyu:

I write to request information and documents about the work that KuCoin is doing to combat cryptocurrency-related fraud. Cryptocurrencies have become scammers' favored means of payment as well as their preferred bait for unsuspecting victims. The annual amount of cryptocurrency lost to fraud is on track to surpass $1 billion in 2022.¹ Multimillion-dollar cryptocurrency scams have become a regular occurrence.² As shown by recent Department of Justice indictments, these scams take many forms, including as commodity scams, fraudulent coin offerings, and sham investment platforms.³ Given the growing popularity of cryptocurrencies both as a form of payment and as an investment, I am concerned by the rapid growth of fraud and consumer abuse. I am also concerned by the apparent lack of action by cryptocurrency exchanges to protect consumers conducting transactions through their platforms.

Cryptocurrency is a form of digital currency based on an immutable digital ledger technology called blockchain. Cryptocurrency is kept in an anonymous digital wallet and can be bought, sold, or traded. These transactions occur on cryptocurrency exchanges and cannot be reversed once made. Bitcoin, one of the most popular cryptocurrencies, launched in 2009, and there are now thousands of cryptocurrencies available. To take advantage of public interest in cryptocurrency, developers use initial coin offerings (ICOs) to secure investments in new cryptocurrencies prior to launch. Despite recent heavy losses to the value of many digital assets, cryptocurrencies continue to have a global market cap in excess of $1 trillion.

As stories of skyrocketing prices and overnight riches have attracted both professional and amateur investors to cryptocurrencies, scammers have cashed in. The lack of a central authority to flag suspicious transactions in many situations, the irreversibility of transactions, and the limited understanding many consumers and investors have of the underlying technology make cryptocurrency a preferred transaction method for scammers.⁴ Consumer interest has also driven the creation of fraudulent cryptocurrencies, in which developers create tokens, list them on exchanges, and generate investments before absconding with investors' dollars. Chainalysis, a blockchain data platform, noted that these so-called "rug pulls" accounted for roughly 37% of cryptocurrency scam revenue 2021, compared to 1% in 2020.⁵

The private sector has taken some steps to protect consumers and investors and curb cryptocurrency fraud. Code audits, where a third-party evaluates the terms of a digital asset, can identify and warn consumers of the vulnerabilities that make fraud schemes possible.⁶ Open-source investigators and organizations such as RugDocs conduct audits and warn potential investors of the risks of certain digital assets.⁷ Some exchanges also maintain insurance policies to cover consumer losses from criminal activity.⁸ However, significant risk remains. Consumers are often unaware of the current patchwork of resources available to inform their investing decisions, and insurance companies are wary to provide insurance to individual consumers given the lack of regulation of digital assets.

Although FinCEN has released guidance discussing how the Bank Secrecy Act applies to virtual currencies, questions remain as to how well this law can regulate decentralized exchanges that use an automated program to facilitate transactions among a network of users. FinCEN's 2019 guidance notes that a "trading platform [that] only provides a forum where buyers and sellers ... post their bids and offers..., and [where] the parties themselves settle any matched transactions through an outside venue, ... does not qualify as a money transmitter under FinCEN regulations." Such decentralized exchanges pose significantly greater risks to investors, making regulation particularly important. While some exchanges review cryptocurrencies before listing them, others allow digital assets to be listed with little or no vetting. Potential vulnerabilities that could easily be identified through code audits are left undiscovered. Insufficient security measures likewise leave users exposed to the outright theft of assets stored on the exchange. Many exchanges have also failed to implement appropriate monitoring of accounts, which can flag illicit activity, notify investors, and prevent transactions with addresses linked to scammers.⁹

For all these reasons, I am concerned about the growth of fraud and consumer abuse linked to cryptocurrencies. Notwithstanding federal regulations, cryptocurrency exchanges must themselves act to protect consumers conducting transactions through their platforms. By implementing audit policies, requiring certain disclosures, delisting, and adopting other safety mechanisms, cryptocurrency exchanges can—and should—create safer environments for consumers.

To assist the Subcommittee in its review of this matter, by September 12, 2022, please produce the following documents dated from the later of January 1, 2009, or the date KuCoin was founded to the present:

1. All documents regarding KuCoin's efforts to combat crypto-related scams and fraud and inform consumers about the risks related to investments in cryptocurrencies;
2. All documents regarding KuCoin's processes to identify, investigate, and remove or flag potentially fraudulent digital assets or accounts used on KuCoin's product(s);
3. All documents setting out KuCoin's policies governing cryptocurrencies, cryptocurrency traders, buyers, sellers, investors, consumers, or any other individual or entity using KuCoin's product(s); and
4. All documents discussing whether to adopt more stringent policies governing cryptocurrencies, cryptocurrency traders, buyers, sellers, investors, consumers, or any other individual or entity using KuCoin's product(s).

The Subcommittee also requests answers to the following questions by September 12, 2022:

3. What mechanisms, such as insurance covering fraud or other criminal acts, does KuCoin have in place to ensure that individuals harmed while using your services are recompensed?
4. For the topics in questions 1 through 3, what mechanisms does KuCoin currently have concrete plans to implement? By when does KuCoin intend to have these mechanisms in place?
5. What actions do you believe the federal government could take to assist cryptocurrency exchanges in combatting fraud and scams?
