America's Labor Market Information System Fact Sheet

The America's Labor Market Information System (ALMIS) is funded by the One-Stop Career Center/ALMIS appropriation. The system produces high-quality workforce information and tools in a variety of media and formats for use by job seekers, employers, and workforce development professionals. This collaborative effort among the states and the Employment and Training Administration is developing the critical information infrastructure supporting the workforce investment system and One-Stop Career Center initiative. ALMIS has Federal, state and local components, including data collection and analysis, research and information product development, direct service delivery, technical assistance, and capacity building. These activities include:

- $ career and occupational information available on the web and in local One-Stop resource centers.
- $ labor market analysts producing custom workforce information for customers from a variety of data sources.
- $ formula grants to states for developing core information products and services in each state resulting in comparable information and services available nationwide.
- $ America's Career Kit, a suite of web-based tools for public access to a nationwide electronic labor exchange, learning resources, career information and local One-Stop locations.
- $ O*NET, the electronic replacement for the Dictionary of Occupational Titles.
- $ the Labor Market Information Institute, a national training institute providing workforce information training to workforce development professionals throughout the nation
- $ multi-state research and development consortia producing standard tools, methodologies and web applications that can be adopted by any state for producing workforce information and providing public access to it.
