 For the United States, one important national security concern is the possibility that our military forces will be required to prop up a local government--Vietnam is the best example of this kind of commitment. While an unpleasant option, fraught with risks, it nonetheless cannot be overlooked. This article examines the difficulty of employing force in this manner and proposes several lessons from our past experiences that seem applicable today.

Database

Joint Universal Lessons Learned System (JULLS). JULLS is a database of knowledge and experience intended to cover all aspects of joint military operations and exercises. Each of the lessons currently in the data base has five parts: (1) Administrative Date, (2) Keywords, (3) Narrative, (4) Milestones, and (5) Source Information. A printer is available for saving the results of a search. Assistance in using JULLS is available from personnel at the reference desk.
